Through the prosecutions, a clear message of intimidation was being sent to farmers – a warning not to select and share their seeds, and to buy them exclusively from the company. There is very draconian set of seed marketing regulations. For years, farmers in Thailand have been resisting pressure from the United States and Europe to adopt strong intellectual property laws on seeds.

These regulations were drafted in and, if adopted, which would allow corporations to certify their seeds in one member country and automatically acquire the right to market them in all COMESA states. We have also learned that efforts to defend seeds succeed to the extent that they are based on broad and diverse mobilisations.
