A child or an adult learns language by virtue of consistent meaningful exposure, not by being taught one word at a time. Deafblind adults can teach us much about how to channel information through the tactile sense, for they make such adaptations every day.

Insights from the blind; comparative studies of blind and sighted infants. Hand-under-hand touching of this kind must be done carefully, with three goals in mind. It will help our communication if we can be increasingly aware of what our hands are saying when they touch. She needs to touch these words in a way that will allow her to attach meaning to them—while she is experiencing the things for which they stand.

The part that hands play in the language development of the child who cannot see language and also Tadoma method, tactile cues, object symbols, two-dimensional symbols, and braille all can serve as ways of making language accessible to the hands of a person who cannot see or hear.
